The central theme of this research is to study the peptide mediators of inflammation, and their role in maintaining immunological homeostasis and in the pathogenesis of inflammatory disease states, including cancer. We have adopted the bovine granulomatous lung disease as a model system to investigate both the regulation of in vivo and in vitro granuloma formation and the effects of chemical modification upon the peptides produced during the evolution of a granuloma. Despite the fact that the in vivo granuloma response does not appear to be dependent on humoral immune mechanisms, the in vitro granuloma cell system is quite sensitive to immunosuppressive and immunomodulatory agents such as cyclosporine, cortisone and colony-stimulating factors. We are investigating the effects of such agents on the kinetics of granuloma formation in vivo as well as the composition of the granuloma cell culture system. In addition, the objectives of this research are to identify the peptides (such as LL-37) produced by granuloma cells and at what rate they are released, and to ascertain their functional role in the inflammatory response. We have shown that immunosuppressive agents cause a rapid depletion of granuloma cells and a decrease in the overall release of peptides into the culture supernatant. We have also shown that incubation of supernatants from immunosuppressed cultures with fractionated medium from either normal or immunosuppressed cultures increases granuloma cell viability and migration, as well as causing a rapid release of radiolabelled peptides. The generation of
