Myometrial subcellular changes in normal term and preterm labor. To determine the effects of oxytocin-induced myometrial contractions on the expression of the muscle proteins and contractile proteins of the human myometrium. Pieces of nonpregnant endomyometrium were taken from 17 women undergoing elective surgery in the second trimester, and tissue from term and preterm labor was obtained from women undergoing elective caesarean delivery. Protein expression was determined by Western blotting, and subcellular changes of myofibril organisation were determined by electron microscopy. Term myometrium has about 5% of the amount of contractile proteins seen in premature labor. There was very little difference in the amount of the majority of proteins in both term and preterm labor. Most proteins were less orderly organised in the myometrium from term and preterm labor than in the control myometrium. The differential expression of proteins in normal labor and their subcellular changes suggests that the mechanism responsible for the normal strength of labor is different from that of premature labor. [Are men supposed to be silent observers during health care provider-patient interactions?]. This study explores the phenomenon of masculine silence and the questions it raises about the structure of gender. Its objectives are twofold: On the one hand, to explain women's willingness to share their experiences and perceptions of health care interactions with their physicians. On the other, to shed light on the experience of masculine silence. The study focuses on the interviews of eight informants who experienced the phenomenon of masculine silence. Grounded theory was used as a methodological approach. Masculine silence is a strategy of 'disclosure and concealment', which takes place both in health care interactions and in family life. It operates in interactions which are characterised by stereotypes which imply a femininity dominated by feelings. The results show that women tend to express themselves more than men during the conversations. In addition, the results reveal the significance of the concept of integrity and how it supports women's willingness to reveal their experiences and perceptions. The results support the proposition that masculine silence may be a way of acting in an inclusive manner towards those who do not have a voice.
