the new BBC Four flagship series Inside No. 9 premiered to scathing reviews and a disappointing box office. Since then, the show's audience figures have dropped, its audience demographics have shifted, and its first episode was the last to be publicly available for free. Another blow came this week, when the show's former star, Oscar James Whitley, was charged with the murder of his business partner's husband. So far, Inside No. 9 has failed to attract the crowds its stars and creators expected it would. Instead of the big crowds that were supposed to watch it, the show now has a small cult following, with some cheering it on and some wondering why it's still being produced in the first place. Despite this, Inside No. 9 is probably still one of the most interesting and ambitious fringe shows in recent years. It's an experiment in televisual storytelling, an attempt to pair a small cast with a large budget. The team also made it bigger, and made a bold choice to change its format. So what do we think will make the show a success? The show is a bizarre and inventive televisual experiment. When the pilot episode of Inside No. 9 was announced in 2015, it was announced as a new four-part "psychosexual murder mystery," which promised to be new and unexplored. Of course, the show in its current form is now a slightly more conventional six-part "psychosexual murder mystery," which is still quite a bit different from standard crime drama and crime-mapping documentaries. But with its surreal format and hard-to-classify narrative, there's no denying that the show has more in common with other bizarre and inventive television than conventional crime. Through a loose narrative that's 6d1f23a050
