In a press conference last month, Brown said, "I think it's time to get serious." "We saw the weakness of the federal government, the weakness of the state government, the weakness of the local government," he said in October. "I think it's time to get serious." Brown's successor, Democratic governor-elect Jerry Brown, who is serving his first term, is only too aware of the dire need to prepare for a potential Democratic sweep in the 2014 elections. In fact, his own campaign for governor, initially centered on the need to re-negotiate the state's contract with Sutter Health hospitals, has morphed into an all-out war with the nation's biggest health care provider, Kaiser, because of what he fears may be an insufficiently robust Medicaid program. In a series of meetings with Kaiser officials and hospital executives, Brown has indicated that he would seek to end California's monopoly on the health care delivery system within the state. For two years, Gov. Brown has been a Democrat for life, and many other elected Democrats in the state have been with him since the beginning. But Brown's principles do not appear to be the 6d1f23a050
