This study explored the extent to which children with and without specific language impairment (SLI) differ on 1) the comprehension of language-related and 2) the appearance of these skills during the first year of schooling. Participants were 36 children with SLI and 36 matched peers. All children received language and cognitive assessments at the ages of 2; 4, 7, and 11 years. The results showed that children with SLI are delayed in their language understanding relative to their chronological peers in most linguistic domains, and that children with SLI are delayed in their ability to use linguistic information to infer others' mental states from linguistic cues and by the end of the first year of schooling have progressed only marginally in these skill areas. Using a combination of univariate and multivariate analyses, the results further showed that these differences in comprehension abilities could not be accounted for by children's differences in intelligence, reading skills, speech-motoric language skills, or word-recognition ability. The findings suggest that children with SLI do not have a fundamental deficit in overall language competence, but rather that their comprehension skills are more weakly developed and, in particular, are less able to generalize the construction of propositions from linguistic cues. These results have important implications for the planning of language interventions and for investigations of the origin of developmental disorders, as they suggest that strategies to improve these children's language understanding may be more effective if designed to address the specific mechanisms that they are unable to rely on.
